

They stare at the sky, waiting. They stare at a ship grown infinitesimal, praying. They are a team, those who fly planes, silent in their union and separate in their needs. Sometimes they can only wait for the touch of destiny. Sometimes they work the clock around and cannot think of what might be or why. Mostly they fly planes because it is their job, because it is their duty, because it is their love.

